STATEMENT OF ISSUE ON APPEAL

The circuit court properly allowed the State to cross-examine Appellant's expert about an issue directly related to the expert's credibility and the reliability of her opinion.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Respondent concurs with Appellant's procedural Statement of the Case.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Prior to Appellant's release from prison, Respondent State of South Carolina ("the State") filed a Petition Pursuant to the Sexually Violent Predator Act (the "SVPA"), seeking Appellant's civil commitment for long term control, care and treatment as a sexually violent predator. The matter was called for a jury trial on September 8, 2014, before the Honorable R. Knox McMahan, Circuit Court Judge.

The State presented testimony from Ana Gomez, M.D., a board certified forensic psychiatrist, who was qualified as an expert in forensic psychiatry. Dr. Gomez was retained by the State to conduct an independent evaluation of Appellant after the court appointed evaluator did not recommend commitment. Dr. Gomez testified she evaluated Appellant using a protocol established by the Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers, and the Sexual Behaviors Clinic and Lab at the Medical University of South Carolina. (Trial Transcript [TT], pp. 32-39; Record on Appeal [R.], pp. 32-39).

As part of the evaluation, Dr. Gomez reviewed records regarding Appellant's sexual and non-sexual offenses, interviewed Appellant, and conducted multiple tests, including psychological and physiological assessments. She testified this was the type of information experts reasonably rely on for psychosexual evaluations. (TT, pp. 38-41; R., pp. 38-41).

On April 7, 2003, Appellant was convicted of first degree criminal sexual conduct with a minor, arising from an incident involving a nine year old girl, and sentenced to twenty years incarceration, suspended to twelve years incarceration and three years probation. Records indicate Appellant went to where the child was sleeping, masturbated in front of her and ejaculated on her stomach and thigh. He also touched her vagina with his fingers and performed oral sex on her. A medical examination confirmed the presence of semen on the child's stomach and thigh. Appellant originally denied the allegations, and told Dr. Gomez the child made up the story. (TT, pp. 44-46, State's Exhibit 2; R., pp. 44-46, 159).

On April 24, 2003, Appellant pled guilty to one count of lewd act on a minor, and sentenced to twelve years incarceration to run concurrent with the criminal sexual conduct with a minor sentence. The offense occurred in January 2001, while Appellant was out on bond for the 1999 criminal sexual conduct offense, and involved a seven year old girl. While the child was sleeping, Appellant woke her up, took off his pants, asked her to touch his penis, and tried to kiss her. He also asked her to get on top of him and "hunch" him, and offered her money to do it. He then rubbed her vagina for "a long time." Appellant originally denied the incident happened, and continued to deny the allegations during the interview with Dr. Gomez. (TT, pp. 41-44, State's Exhibit 1; R., pp. 41-44, 158).

Dr. Gomez testified Appellant was also charged with lewd act on a child in 1993. The charge arose from an incident involving Appellant's four year old nephew. Records indicated Appellant, who was not wearing any underwear, went to where the child was watching television, picked the child up by his feet and had the child touch Appellant's penis with his mouth. The child also reported Appellant then laid on top of him and tried to get him to take his pants off. The records further indicated the child later recanted, and Appellant told Dr. Gomez the charges were dropped. Dr. Gomez testified she considered the allegations as part of the basis for her ultimate opinion. (TT, pp. 47-48; R., pp. 47-48).

Dr. Gomez also considered Appellant's convictions for simple assault and criminal domestic violence. She testified non-sexual offenses are relevant to a sex offender evaluation because they are considered on one of the assessment tools, and they go to a pattern of behavior. (TT, pp. 47- 49; R., pp. 47-49).

Dr. Gomez further testified Appellant did not accept accountability for any of his sexual offenses, which was part of what she considered in reaching her opinion. She stated Appellant either claimed the events did not happen, or the child made up the story. (TT, p. 49; R., p. 49).

Dr. Gomez identified seven different assessment tools she used in Appellant's evaluation, all of which provided additional data points for her to consider in reaching a conclusion, but she stated none of the tools should be used alone. She testified about each tool individually, and related the results on each. Appellant's result on several tools could not be scored because of concerns he was manipulating his responses. (TT, pp. 50-62; R., pp. 50-62).

Based on all the data she collected, Dr. Gomez concluded Appellant has the mental abnormality of pedophilia, non-exclusive type, sexually attracted to both male and female children. She opined to a reasonable degree of medical certainty Appellant's pedophilia causes him serious difficulty in controlling his sexual behavior toward children, and considering his failure to accept responsibility and lack of sex offender treatment, he is likely to commit future acts of sexual violence against children if not confined for treatment. (TT, pp, 63-70; R., pp. 63-70).

Appellant presented Marie Gehle, PhD., as his expert witness.¹ She was originally appointed by the circuit court as the evaluator in Appellant's case, and was qualified as an expert in forensic psychology without objection. She testified she had conducted more than 160 evaluations under the SVPA. (TT, pp. 81-84; R., pp. 81-84).

Dr. Gehle testified she had the same information Dr. Gomez had in evaluating Appellant, and also interviewed him. She also concluded Appellant has the mental abnormality of pedophilia, non-exclusive type, attracted to minor females.² (TT, pp. 84-85; R., pp. 84-85).

In her evaluation, Dr. Gehle only used one risk assessment tool, the Static-99R, which consists of ten questions the evaluator answers primarily based on information in the records, such as prior sexual offenses and non-sexual offenses, and has a score range of negative three to twelve. Based on Dr. Gehle's answers, Appellant scored two on the Static-99R, which is in the low to moderate risk of reoffending category. Premised primarily on the Static-99R score, Dr. Gehle opined Appellant did have the relevant mental abnormality of pedophilia, but was not a risk to reoffend, so she did not recommend commitment. (TT, pp. 85-97; R., pp. 85-97).

On cross-examination, Dr. Gehle conceded she did not perform any testing other than the Static-99R in connection with Appellant's evaluation, but stated she looked at a list of risk factors found in a large meta-analysis. She disagreed with Dr. Gomez's ¹Her name is spelled "Gale" in the transcript, but "Gehle" is the proper spelling.

²She limited his pedophilia as "attracted to females," rather than attracted to both females and males, because she did not consider the 1993 charge involving Appellant's nephew.

testimony regarding an established protocol for evaluating sex offenders, and stated the protocol she uses was not developed by any professional organization, but she personally developed it from books, her own research, and consultation with other professionals.

Dr. Gehle agreed Appellant did not take responsibility for his sex offenses, and testified he admitted to her he was preoccupied with sex in the past. She acknowledged Appellant planned to live with his sister where he would be exposed to young children, and testified his “relapse prevention plan” was to just walk away and not be around children, which she did not think was “an ideal relapse prevention plan.” She further acknowledged having access to children puts Appellant at risk to reoffend. (TT, 98-105; R., pp. 98-105).

On re-direct, Appellant characterized Dr. Gehle’s experience doing sexual predator evaluations as “routine,” and she testified conducting such evaluations is her full time job at the South Carolina Department of Mental Health. (TT, pp. 110-111; R., pp. 110-111). On re-cross, the State asked Dr. Gehle if her opinion had ever been wrong in a sexual predator case, and when she stated she did not know, the State asked her about a sexual predator evaluation she did in August 2012, in which she opined the person did not meet the criteria for commitment. (TT, pp. 111-113; R., pp. 111-113).

The State then showed Dr. Gehle an arrest warrant for that same person from March 2014. Appellant objected on relevancy grounds, and the State responded the issue “goes to the reliability of her reports,” because the person “quickly reoffended after she authored that report.” The circuit court overruled Appellant’s objection. (TT, p. 113; R., pp. 113).

The warrant alleged the person raped someone, and his DNA was identified by a direct match on the national DNA database. (TT, pp. 113-114; R., pp. 113-114). The State then asked Dr. Gehle: “And based on the information you have another woman has now been raped, is that correct?” The circuit court sustained Appellant’s objection to the question.

Appellant testified he just wanted to get out and be left alone, go to church and change his life. He said he was “sorry” about things in the past, and promised he was not going to bother a child. (TT, pp. 116-121; R., pp., 116-121).

On cross-examination, Appellant denied sexually assaulting any of the victims for which he was convicted. When asked why he was sorry if he did not do anything to the victims, Appellant said he was sorry “they accused [him] of what they said I did, but [he] didn’t do it.” He also admitted he did not go to sex offender treatment when it was offered to him in prison because it was not court ordered. (TT, pp. 122-127; R., pp. 122-127).

In closing arguments, the State told the jury “one of the things that a juror must decide is how to consider and weigh the evidence that has been brought before you.” (TT, pp. 133; R., pp. 133). The State further asked the jury to look at the entirety of the case, and to focus on the different evaluations between Dr. Gomez and Dr. Gehle. (TT, pp. 134; R., pp. 134).

The jury found Appellant is a sexually violent predator beyond a reasonable doubt, and he was committed to the South Carolina Department of Mental Health for long term control, care and treatment. (TT, pp. 153, 157; R., pp. 153, 157). This appeal followed.

ARGUMENT

The circuit court properly allowed the State to cross-examine Appellant's expert about an issue directly related to the expert's credibility and the reliability of her opinion.

Appellant contends the circuit court erred in allowing the State to cross-examine Dr. Gehle about her opinion in a recent case, the subject of which was released based on her opinion, but was arrested approximately eighteen months later for rape, because it was irrelevant and unduly prejudicial. This contention takes the testimony completely out of context, and ignores its direct relevance and high probative value regarding Dr. Gehle's credibility and the reliability of her report.

The admission or exclusion of evidence is a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be disturbed in the absence of a manifest abuse of discretion accompanied by probable prejudice, which occurs when the conclusions of the trial court either lack evidentiary support or are controlled by an error of law. State v. Kromah, 401 S.C. 340, 737 S.E.2d 490, 495 (2013). The scope of cross-examination is also within the discretion of the trial court, and the court's decision will not be reversed on appeal absent a showing of prejudice. State v. Colf, 337 S.C. 622, 525 S.E.2d 246, 247-48 (2000); State v. McEachern, 399 S.C. 125, 731 S.E.2d 604, 609-610 (Ct. App. 2012) (same).

A. Expert Credibility/Reliability

Mere procedural consistency by an expert witness does not ensure reliability absent some evidence demonstrating the individual expert is able to draw reliable results from the procedures he or she consistently applies. State v. Chavis, 412 S.C. 101, 771

S.E.2d 336, 339 (2015).³ Thus, Dr. Gehle's qualification as an expert in forensic psychology did not insulate her ultimate opinion in this case from scrutiny regarding the reliability of her protocol or opinion.

1. Protocol/Methodology

Dr. Gomez testified she uses the sex offender evaluation protocol established by the Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers, and the Sexual Behaviors Clinic and Lab at the Medical University of South Carolina. Dr. Gomez also testified the Static-99R risk assessment tool is widely accepted, but it should not be used as a stand-alone tool because it only indicates one data point for evaluation.⁴ She utilized the Static99-R, as well as a records review, her interview with Appellant, and six other psychological tests and risk assessment tools, which provided her multiple data points to consider in reaching a conclusion. (TT, pp. 38-70; R., pp. 38-70).

In contrast, Dr. Gehle testified her evaluation consisted of reviewing records, interviewing Appellant, and completing the Static99-R. (TT, pp. 84-96; R., pp. 84-96). On cross-examination, she stated there is no established protocol for a sexual predator evaluation, and she personally developed the protocol she uses for an evaluation. She did not perform any psychological or physiological tests on Appellant, but used the

⁴ Dr. Gomez testified the developers of the Static99-R do not intend for it to be used as a stand-alone tool. (TT, pp. 52-53; R., pp. 52-53).

Static-99R as the sole risk assessment data point for her opinion. (TT, pp. 100-104; R., pp. 100-104).

This stark discrepancy in protocols and methodology reasonably brought into question the reliability of Dr. Gehle's report in this case, particularly in light of her admitted failure to use a recognized, peer-reviewed protocol, or even recognize there is an established protocol. The State's initial cross-examination of Dr. Gehle went directly to that issue, and during closing argument, the State emphasized the importance of weighing the risk assessment protocols used by the two experts in order to determine whether there was a likelihood Appellant would re-offend if not confined for treatment.

2. Appellant opened the door.

Significantly, the State asked about the results of Dr. Gehle's previous evaluations only after Appellant attempted to rehabilitate her on re-direct examination. When a party introduces evidence about a particular matter, the other party is entitled to introduce evidence in explanation or rebuttal thereof, even if the latter evidence would have been incompetent or irrelevant had it been offered initially. State v. Jackson, 364 S.C. 329, 613 S.E.2d 374, 377 (2005).

As discussed above, the State's initial cross-examination focused on Dr. Gehle's methodology. In an obvious attempt to rehabilitate her credibility on re-direct, Appellant stressed the fact she "routinely" does sexual predator evaluations as her full-time job at the Department of Mental Health. (TT, pp. 110-111; R., pp. 110-111). Thereafter, the State was entitled to present evidence Dr. Gehle's "routine" sexual predator evaluations have not always been correct, and at least one person she found was not likely to re-offend if released, was arrested for another sex offense shortly after he was released based on her evaluation. (TT, pp. 111-114; R., pp. 111-114). Contrary to Appellant's assertion this evidence was not a challenge to Dr. Gehle's methodology or ability to conduct a sexual predator evaluation, it went directly to her credibility and the reliability of her "routine" opinion in this case.

Appellant contends the State's closing argument establishes the evidence regarding Dr. Gehle's prior inaccurate evaluation was presented to encourage the jury to render a verdict based on fear. Appellant's contention glosses over part of the State's argument, cherry-picks other parts out of context, and ultimately misconstrues the intent of the State's argument by "look[ing] over the heads of the crowd and pick[ing] out its friends." Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551, 616, (2005) (SCALIA, J., dissenting).

By way of example, Appellant partially quotes the statement "are you really satisfied that a pedophile should be released out into this community" from the State's closing argument, but conveniently fails to quote the most significant part of the statement. (Brief of Appellant, p. 11). The entire statement was:

So in conclusion at the end of the day the ultimate question you have to ask yourself is despite the fact that another doctor came to the conclusion that [Appellant] should not be committed, as a juror and a member of this community, are you really satisfied that a pedophile should be released out into this community when he's never had any sexually (sic) offender treatment, doesn't even think he has a problem, is going to live in a house with a family that I submit to you that enables him and gives him access to children just like he did before?

(TT, pp. 135-136; R., pp. 135-136) (emphasis added). Read in context, it is clear the State did not focus on the mere fact Appellant is a pedophile, or even Dr. Gehle's prior incorrect evaluation, to play on the jurors' fear, but pointed to the evidence regarding his lack of treatment for his pedophilia, his refusal to acknowledge he even had a problem, and his unrealistic living plans if released as a basis for the verdict.⁵ Rather than an emotional appeal for a verdict based on fear, these were legitimate facts, supported by the evidence, for the jury's consideration in determining whether Appellant was likely to re-offend if not confined.

In addition, Appellant points to the State's final statement to the jury, which concluded with the question "[w]hat do you think is going to happen," as evidence the State was playing on the jury's fear rather than relying on the evidence. Again, read in context, and considered in light of the issue before the jury, the question was entirely appropriate.

During his closing argument, Appellant urged the jury to "not be subjects and fall prey to the fear that the State hopes to have you in," and argued the State wanted the jury to "just rely on the smoke screen and cloud of fear." (TT, pp. 139, 141; R., pp. 139, 141). In reply, the State argued the case was not about fear, but was about "a very serious evaluation, very serious crimes and a very thorough evaluation by Dr. Gomez." In conclusion, the State argued:

So I leave you with this: You have a person who on more than one occasion who has sexually assaulted children. He takes no accountability to (sic) what he's done and he hasn't had sex offender treatment and he's refused it when it has been offered. He's going to go live in a house where people are going to allow him to be around children. You heard the testimony. What do you think is going to happen?

⁵In fact, the State only referred briefly to Dr. Gehle's prior incorrect evaluation once during closing argument, and simply stated: "If [Appellant] gets out and if [he] is wrong - - and he's been wrong before, and in fact, I submit his own expert has been wrong before -- and Dr. Gomez is right, he's going to get out and he's going to hurt another kid." (TT, p. 136; R., pp. 136).

(TT, p. 142; R., pp. 142) (emphasis added). Again, these were legitimate facts supported by the evidence rather than appeal for a verdict based on fear.

Further, Appellant concedes the only issue in dispute at trial was whether his pedophilia made him likely to engage in acts of sexual violence if not confined. (Brief of Appellant, p. 13). Asking the jury to think about what would happen if Appellant was released in light of all the evidence presented merely paraphrased exactly what the jury had to determine, and Appellant's attempt to construe it as intended solely to invoke fear not only takes it out of context, it is a gross misrepresentation.

3. Probative/Prejudice

Finally, Appellant contends the probative value of Dr. Gehle's inaccurate conclusion in a previous "routine" evaluation was little to none, but the prejudice to him was substantial because there is "no doubt" the inquiry "was calculated to play on the emotions of the jury and did in fact play on the emotions of the jury." (Brief of Appellant, p. 15). As discussed above, the State's inquiry had nothing to do with emotion, but went directly to the reliability of Dr. Gehle's "routine" evaluation. Further, unless he is a mind-reader, there is no way Appellant could possibly know this one piece of evidence, as opposed to all the other evidence, "did in fact play on the emotions of the jury."

Undue prejudice does not mean the damage to a defendant's case from the legitimate probative force of the evidence, but instead comes from evidence tending to suggest a decision on an improper basis. State v. Lee, 399 S.C. 521, 732 S.E.2d 225, 229 (Ct. App. 2012). While all evidence is in some way meant to be prejudicial, only unfairly prejudicial evidence is subject to this evaluation. Id.

The only disputed issue for jury determination in this case was whether Appellant's pedophilia made him likely to commit future acts of sexual violence if not confined for treatment. Two experts had differing opinions on that issue, making the reliability of their methodologies and opinions highly relevant and probative. Appellant attacked Dr. Gomez's credibility and reliability based on the number of sexual predator evaluations she had performed, and her conclusions in those cases, while touting Dr. Gehle's "too numerous to count," "routine" evaluations. (TT, pp. 76, 110-111, 139-140; R., pp, 76, 110-111,139-140). In determining Dr. Gehle's credibility and reliability, evidence she reached an inaccurate conclusion in a prior "routine" evaluation was appropriate for the jury's consideration.

Beyond the reliability of Dr. Gehle's opinion, it was undisputed Appellant had been convicted of a sexually violent offense, and had the relevant mental abnormality of pedophilia. The jury also had undisputed evidence Appellant had no sex offender treatment and refused it when afforded an opportunity to take it, he had no realistic prevention plans, and he took no direct accountability for his offenses. Finally, the jury could consider the circumstances of Appellant's sexually violent convictions, including evidence he committed one of those offenses (lewd act) while out on bond for the previous offense (criminal sexual conduct with a minor). It is more likely the jury's verdict was based on the extensive evidence indicating Appellant would re-offend if not confined for sex offender treatment, rather than an emotional response to one piece of evidence.

The circuit court properly allowed the State to pursue relevant inquiries into Dr. Gehle's credibility and the reliability of her conclusion in this case, Appellant opened the door to those inquiries, and any prejudice to Appellant from evidence regarding Dr. Gehle's incorrect conclusions in a previous case did not substantially outweigh its probative value to the credibility and reliability of the opposing experts' opinions, especially in light of all other relevant evidence before the jury.⁶

⁶Appellant's extreme rhetoric about the emotion and stress of a sexual predator trial does not change the analysis. There are many types of trials, such as wrongful death and survivor actions, not to mention death penalty trials, that are extraordinarily emotional and stressful for jurors, but the admissibility of evidence legal analysis remains the same.

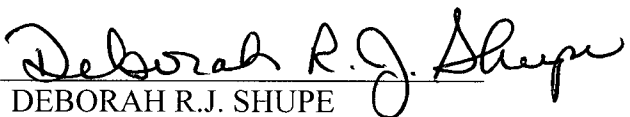

CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, Respondent submits the jury verdict finding Appellant is a sexually violent predator beyond a reasonable doubt should be affirmed.
