APPELLANT'S REPLY TO BRIEF OF RESPONDENTS

Respondents make a single argument in favor of their case – that Grady's fall was "unexplained" and thus not compensable. Grady again submits that this is a misinterpretation of "unexplained fall" jurisprudence and that Grady repeatedly explained the circumstances of her fall throughout the course of her claim.

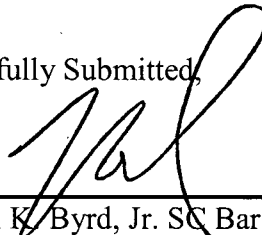

The crux of an "unexplained fall" is whether the origin of the fall can be explained by either the injured worker or by witnesses (or some other method). In the instant case, Grady has explained her fall from the very beginning. She was walking to her car after just having exited the building upon concluding her work for the day. As she was walking, she stumbled, and this caused her to fall.

Just as in Nicholson v. SC Department of Social Services, 411 S.C. 381, 769 S.E.2d 1 (2015), Grady' fall was neither idiopathic nor unexplained. It was not idiopathic because it did not result from any internal breakdown in Grady's body. There is no evidence whatsoever to this effect, and the Respondents admit that this is not an idiopathic injury case. (Brief of Respondent p. 9) Furthermore, and more importantly, Grady explained her fall. The origin of Grady's fall was the stumble. Asking Grady to relate back her fall to anything more than the stumble is doing nothing more than asking Grady to point to a "fault" that caused her fall. Respondents argue that Grady must show that her fall was the fault of something more than her stumble, but that is exactly the kind of misinterpretation that the Nicholson case warns against. "The court of appeals erred in requiring a claimant to prove the existence of a hazard or danger because it erroneously injected fault into workers' compensation law." Nicholson, at p. 389. Grady need not show that she tripped or slipped on any particular hazard. In fact, there was no hazard or danger present in Grady's case. And, even if there was, she is not required to prove as much. What she is required to do is give a factual explanation of the circumstances of her fall.¹ She did just that, repeatedly, during the course of this claim. She was not unconscious; she was not in a coma. She was not struck without memory due to some external or internal force. She stumbled while working and broke her shoulder and her claim should be found compensable. There is no substantial evidence to support the Commission's conclusion that Grady's fall was unexplained, because the only evidence is that she did explain that she stumbled, fell, and was injured. Plus, it was legal error to conclude that Grady's fall was "unexplained."

For all of the reasons set for in Grady's Brief of Appellant, Grady demonstrated that she was within the course of her employment when she suffered an accidental, non-idiopathic fall that resulted in an injury that was incidental to and arose out of her employment. Furthermore, her fall was not unexplained. The Decision and Order of the Appellate Panel should be reversed, and this Court should find as a matter of law that Grady's claim is compensable.

Respectfully Submitted,

¹ This key factor is what differentiates Grady's case from other unexplained fall cases. For example, in the Turner v. SAIIA Construction, 419 S.C. 98, 796 S.E.2d 150 (Ct. App. 2016) case, the claimant was unconscious when he was found on the ground next to his truck. He had no memory of his fall and was unable to give any factual explanation for what happened. In this case, Grady has always been able to give a factual explanation for how she became injured.
