

The US, reported nearly 56,000 new coronavirus cases, the highest daily tally in four days, as communities around the country face decisions on whether to reopen schools in the fall and testing trends for the virus vary across states.

Total cases in the US, topped 5.2 million, about a quarter of the world-wide total cases million, about a quarter of the world-wide total, according to data compiled by John Hopkins University, for Wednesday. The country reported 1,499 deaths, its highest daily count since May 27, with 1,518 deaths.

The seven day average of the new infections topped the 14 day average in 13 states and Washington, D.C., according to a Wall Street Journal analysis of John Hopkins data, suggesting that cases were rising in those areas, when a seven-day average suggests an increase. Looking at averages also helps smooth out data anomalies.

Testing trends across the country vary. In 17 states, the seven-day moving average of tests per 1000 people was down from a week ago, according to John Hopkins. It was higher in 14 states.

We need to keep up if not accelerate, the testing pace," said Mercedes Carnethon, vice chair of the department of preventive medicine at the Feinberg School of Medicine at Northwestern University.
