My father was more excited about the purchase of his truck than a kid receiving a bike on Christmas. I remember him sending me a picture the day he purchased the truck and I responded by telling him I could not wait to see it in person. The next time I was home, he hurried over to give me a "tour" of his "new" truck. I complimented him over and over on how this appeared to be a "brand new truck". The inside was nice and clean. I remember actually getting into the truck and sitting in the front seats. I pulled down the visors and I made a joke about him having a "fancy visor" because there were lights around the mirror area of them. I also tested the driver seats automatic seat adjuster. I believe my father was most excited about this feature. This truck even smelled new!! This was a very nice truck and as I previously stated, appeared to be brand new! I was so proud and happy for my dad because I knew that this was something he talked about getting for a very long time-now he finally had it.

A few weeks passed by and I noticed my dad was no longer driving his new truck. I asked him why and he stated that he had to have a part put inside his car and upon receiving it back, some things seemed different about the interior of the vehicle. He asked me to take a look and I did. Because I am a very meticulous person, my father did not have to mention any of the changes that he noticed. I was able to instantly point them out myself. I immediately noticed that the overall inside of truck looked nothing like what I had seen just weeks before. The overhead of the truck had stains on it, specifically what seemed to be cigarette smoke holes on each corner of the hood. The automatic seat adjuster was no longer there. The visors were regular/older visors with no light. His driver seat sat extremely wonky-it was lopsided so to speak. The seatbelts were very dirty; it seemed as if there was oil or some like substance on them, as well as around the interior of the truck. I also remember the middle seat in the front of the truck was no longer able to be a full seat, meaning you could no longer pull the armrest upward. Overall, the interior of the truck was very dirty and even smelled like cigarette smoke (my father does not smoke).

I was very disappointed when I noticed this. My father was outraged-which is to be expected. He stopped driving the truck for weeks. I encouraged him to contact the man who sold him the truck in order to get a statement from him about the condition of the truck when it was purchased. I am happy that my father decided to pursue a case concerning this matter because what has been done here is unfair and a total disregard to every concept of integrity. My father is a proud man and he works very hard for what he has; he worked hard for his new truck and he deserves just that.
